Shaking Up Cabinet to Shrink the Government

By BENJAMIN HERSHEL

WASHINGTON — President Trump, spooked by conservatives who worry that his trade policies threaten the prosperity of blue states like California, was looking for a trade-off on Monday. Instead, he cascaded a whole-government reshuffle of his cabinet.

Mr. Trump, in a Tuesday meeting with his aides, said he was considering a shake-up because he was tired of the political merry-go-round of the past administration, according to a senior administration official.

He was not dissuaded by the immediate criticism from friends and foes alike, the official said, and would make the announcement after Memorial Day.

WASHINGTON — The United States is preparing to house as many as 20,000 migrant children in their American military bases, a move that may be the latest in a string of shifting immigration policies.

The White House is preparing to send a letter to federal agencies later this week asking them to begin making plans for the children, a senior administration official said on Monday.

The officials also said they had not yet determined where the children would be housed.

The move comes as the Trump administration faces mounting criticism for its policies on immigration.

The White House has been trying to address the issue of children separated from their parents at the border.

The number of children being housed is expected to be small, officials said.

The administration has already moved to curtail the practice of separating families at the border.

The administration announced last week that it would begin reunifying families who had been separated.

The administration has said it would reunite all families who had been separated.

But the administration has not said how many families would be reunited.

The administration has also said it would not reunite families who had been separated for more than 20 days.
